I'm interested in hearing about your experience with the iPad Pro and Photoshop Sketch. I'm not surprised that LR RAW to iPad brings the exported files into the iPad for editing, but am curious about knowing whether they're shared to a desktop or to Photoshop in another way. For example, if you exported an image using LR RAW to iPad, it will be in Lightroom on the iPad. When you're in Lightroom on the iPad, you can export an image by going to File>Export. When you do so, there should be a dialogue box asking if you want to share the image. If you want to do this, simply choose Copy to Clipboard from the list of options. When you're done in Photoshop sketch, you can either open the Lightroom app on your Mac, open the image in Photoshop Sketch, or save to iCloud and have Lightroom automatically open the image there. Using a feature called automation, you can automate the latter two to occur automatically when you're in Photoshop Sketch. It's also now possible to automatically open the image in Photoshop Sketch, even if you filled an image in LRRAW to iPad first, via a feature called in-app automation. Going back to the dialogue box that asks you to share the image, there's a small "Sync" button in the middle of the dialogue box. Tap it and you can see a few different ways that the image can be shared with other apps, such as email. If you're using your Mac to import the image, tap Done to export it to a desktop and then to share it—meaning that no iPad is involved. Liked your insight on the iPad Pro as a creative tool. I was on the verge of making the switch myself and could see the right reasons to do so. I haven't made the leap yet. But the iPad Pro, while not worth my time at this point, is certainly a viable option.
